PEDIATRIC CARE AND CHECKLIST

USE OF THE PEDIATRIC SYMPTOM CHECKLIST TO SCREEN FOR PSYCHOSOCIAL PROBLEMS IN PRIMARY CARE: A NATIONAL FEASIBILITY STUDY

Background: Routine use of a brief psychosocial screening instrument has been proposed as a means of improving recognition, management, and referral of children's psychosocial morbidity in primary care.

Objective: To assess the feasibility of routine psychosocial screening using the Pediatric Symptom Checklist (PSC) in pediatric settings by using a brief version of the checklist in a large sample representative of the full range of pediatric practice settings in the United States and Canada. We evaluated large-scale screening and the performance of the PSC in detecting psychosocial problems by (1) determining whether the prevalence of psychosocial dysfunction identified by the PSC was consistent with findings in previous, smaller samples; (2) assessing whether the prevalence of positive PSC screening scores varied by geographic subgroup; and (3) determining whether the PSC was completed by a significant proportion of parents from all subgroups and settings.

Patients and Methods: Twenty-one thousand sixty-five children between the ages of 4 and 15 years were seen in 2 large primary care networks: the Ambulatory Sentinel Practice Network and the Pediatric Research in Office Settings network, involving 395 pediatric and family practice clinicians in 44 states, Puerto Rico, and 4 Canadian provinces. Parents were asked to complete a brief questionnaire that included demographic information, history of mental health services, the 25-item PSC, and the number of pediatric visits within the past 6 months.

Results: The overall prevalence rates of psychosocial dysfunction as measured by the PSC in school-aged and preschool-aged pediatric outpatients (13% and 20%, respectively) were nearly identical to the rates that had been reported in several smaller samples (12%, 14% among school-aged children and 7%, 14% among preschoolers). Consistent with previous findings, children from low-income families were twice as likely to be scored as dysfunctional on the PSC than were children from higher-income families. Similarly, children from single-parent as opposed to those from 2-parent families and children with a past history of mental health services showed an elevated risk of psychosocial impairment. The current study was the first to demonstrate a 50% increase in risk of impairment for male children. The overall rate of completed forms was 97%, well within an acceptable range, and at least 94% of the parents in each sociodemographic subgroup completed the PSC form.

Conclusions: Use of the PSC offers an approach to the recognition of psychosocial dysfunction that is sufficiently consistent across groups and locales to become part of comprehensive pediatric care in virtually all outpatient settings. In addition to its clinical utility, the consistency and widespread acceptability of the PSC make it well suited for the next generation of pediatric mental health services research, which can address whether earlier recognition of and intervention for psychosocial problems in pediatrics will lead to cost-effective outcomes.

CHILDHOOD psychosocial dysfunction, considered a "new morbidity" 20 years ago, has become widely acknowledged as the most common chronic condition of children and adolescents. Epidemiological studies report that 14% to 20% of all school-aged US children and 15% of preschoolers have an emotional and/or behavioral disorder. The rates of psychosocial impairment seem to be higher in risk groups such as low-income, single-parent households.

Pediatricians have long been an important first resource for parents who are worried about their children's behavioral problems. With the advent of managed and especially capitated health systems, primary care providers assume an even greater "gatekeeping" responsibility to identify, manage, and refer children with emotional and/or behavioral disorders. Yet, recent studies estimate that only about 20% of these children are identified by their primary care physicians and that, once identified, only a fraction of them receive appropriate mental health treatment.

Despite the growing burden of psychosocial morbidity, pediatricians do not receive adequate training concerning psychosocial problems, are hesitant to attach potentially stigmatizing labels to children, do not have time during office visits to address psychosocial needs,

Medicine is a very important field, and pediatrics is one of the more delicate specializations of medicine. When performing any sort of pediatric care, there are certain procedures a physician will need to follow. For those who are learning about medicine and going through a pediatric program, using a pediatric care and checklist study guide is pretty much essential so that you can absorb everything possible about working in pediatrics. After leaving medical school, some newer pediatricians may want to keep a pediatric care and checklist study guide handy so that they can have it for consultation and so that the checklist becomes a habit.
