Excerpt: ... IT is not without some hesitation and much diffidence, that I venture on the attempt of forming a general estimate of the natural endowments and acquired talents of this extraordinary youth. It is a subject on which a great diversity of opinions has necessarily been formed; and they have been formed, for the most part, with that impatience of suspense and of deliberation, which is always felt, when the matter under consideration, is of popular interest. The merits of the young Roscius is a point on which, though very few have reflected, every one has decided. Theatrical criticism may be thought by some, a branch of knowledge requiring extensive enquiry and natural sagacity, but it is an art to which every auditor thinks himself competent, and a prerogative which he never fails to exercise with unhesitating freedom. In writing on such a subject, therefore, it is difficult to avoid, and perhaps difficult not to deserve, the charge of presumption, of ignorance, or of partiality; and in appealing to such a variety of judges, nothing but very limited approbation can reasonably be expected. A person endowed with such an affluence of natural gifts for the theatric art as the young Roscius, is a phenomenon of such rare emergence, that several centuries may elapse without producing such another. He has, indeed, no natural deficiencies, but such as necessarily arise from his very early age, and the circumstances in which he is placed. His face is not exactly beautiful, but is as much so as can be wished, for all the purposes of the drama, and for the complete gratification of the eye. In a state of quiescence, it is not marked by any particular expression; but when his features are lighted up by internal emotion, they exhibit in turn, every movement of ...
