

Arthur Cohen: A Memoir (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Arthur Cohen: A Memoir
In attempting to write a short account of my father, I am impelled by the wish that his descendants should have some impression of a very remarkable man. The task is a difficult one, because the outward conditions of his life were in no way exciting; he was, moreover, a man who was not given to enlarge on his experiences outward or inward, past or present, and naturally the time when these would have been most vivid was before I could appreciate them; and later on, he seldom discoursed to me on the obscure topics that were engrossing him - law, mathematics, philosophy - and not even much on politics. My mother, who, when he embarked on his political career, would often talk of writing his life, was always the chief recipient of his ideas and aspirations, and would no doubt have been able to give many more characteristic anecdotes of him and of his surroundings, and could have traced the development of his thoughts and ideals in a way that is impossible to one belonging to a younger generation. But a yet younger generation may be interested in hearing some of the every-day details of the people from whom they are descended, as well as the manners of a past time, for it is already ninety years since my father was born.
